Paperback. Book Condition: New. Paperback. Chapter 3 It had been four years since Jeanette received a child support check from Lances father, Clarence Humphrey. She knew one day shed have to sit her son down and explain to him why his father wasnt around but for now, her main focus was making sure he had a stable, stress free childhood. There were days when shed look at Lance and tear up reminiscing about her relationship with his daddy. A senior at Greerfield High School, Clarence Humphrey was the starting football Quarterback and the most popular guy around. Known for his nickname, The Rock, he was about 62 and one hundred ninety-five pounds of solid muscle. He was every girls dream. Clarence was known for his track record when it came to scoring with the pretty girls. Several of them, including three of the varsity cheerleaders had fallen prey to his womanizing charm and he was now in pursuit of none-other than Jeanette. Clarence had been eyeing her in the halls on several occasions and was waiting for the right time to approach her. That time came one Friday at a pep rally when he spotted her as she entered the gate. His eyes scanned her five foot, four inch frame. Stacked in all the right places, he was intrigued by her mocha completion and the way her hair draped her shoulders. She definitely gave new meaning to beauty at its best. There was no way he was about to let her get away. Clarence quickly made his way down from the bleachers, arriving at the gate just in time. Hey pretty lady, Im Clarence, he said extending his hand. Nice to meet you Clarence, Jeanette said while walking straight ahead. Oh, so thats all I get Jeanette stopped long enough...
